Jinnah Pakistan And Islamic Identity

What Mohandas K. Gandhi was to India, Mohammed Ali Jinnah was to Pakistan--the architect of its statehood. In Jinnah, Pakistan and Islamic Identity, Akbar S. Ahmed shines the spotlight on a man whose character, he feels, has been distorted by the official Pakistani line. Though Jinnah was clearly interested in ensuring a homeland for Muslims, Ahmed's book makes clear that this London-trained lawyer was no Islamic fundamentalist.

Under all these statements Pakistan would have become an Islamic state where sovereignty would have been associated with Allah and the centre of power would have been only the Quran and Sunnah. Today, Pakistan and Jinnah are different things for different people. Modernist Muslims believe in the Muslim view and secular Jinnah, the same conservative Muslims in Islamic view and Islamic Jinnah. Due to this identity based ideological ambiguity, both Pakistan and Jinnah are a contradiction.
