Human beings are omnivores. That means we eat plants, meat, mushrooms—just about anything. But because we are omnivores we have very little built-in instinct that tells us which foods are good for us and which aren't. That's the dilemma—we can eat anything, but how do we know what to eat? The omnivore's dilemma has been around a long time.

In 1856, the government instituted broad categories for corn, including Number 2, which was commodity corn. This created a standard for the corn that erased the need for any further attention to the crop's quality or individuality, and resulted in farmers focusing only on the amount they were able to grow, making yield the measurement of success.

Pollan dates the upswing in corn consumption to the 1970s, when President Nixon's Secretary of Agriculture, Earl Butz, instituted a policy of driving up agricultural yields in order to drive down the price of corn. The result was that food became cheap and plentiful. People started eating more—and with the invention of high-fructose corn syrup, they had even more incentive to buy those ...
