Home to 60% of the world's population, Asia has been the most important site of transnational migration in the past decades. Much of transnational mobility in and from Asia takes the form of short-term contract labour migration, which traces its origins to the contract coolie system of the colonial era (Massey et al., 1998, p. 181). The majority of Asian migrant workers are in the prime of their reproductive lives, leaving families including children behind in home countries.
